

5. Australian Mail Processed Through the British Army Postal Service

Although the Australian Light Horse Brigades each had specific datestamps, there were no Australian cancelling devices for the Divisional Headquarters, with the mail being almost totally processed through the British Army Postal Service.

There are three good reasons for this. Firstly, after the Gallipoli Campaign mail security was greatly tightened up as all the Australian datestamps were easily identifiable, especially the privately produced censor cachets. Secondly, the British Army postal service was second to none, and since they were responsible for the distribution of mail to the Australian units, there would be no reason why their services should not be used in reverse. Finally, the Light Horsemen were mobile units, and when not engaged in battle, were continuously on the move for patrolling and reconnaissance. It would be quicker for the postal corporal to exchange the outgoing mail for that incoming on the ration wagon, which in due course would pass a British Army post office.

The British wanted to lock down the postal service for the entire campaign. British type datestamps were manufactured for the Australian units, as well as the Headquarters and the central processing locations in Cairo and Alexandria.

6. The role of the Australian Flying Corps

Although this campaign was mainly fought as a Light Horse Campaign, the Australian Flying Corps played an important role in surveillance and air cover for the soldiers. Their aircraft were inferior to the German machines until mid way through 1917, when the Allied technology and fighting tactics became superior and they began to take control of the skies. Although their aircraft were flimsy, their bombing and machine gun power in attacking enemy columns was used to deadly effect, especially at Wadi Fara in September 1918 where they annihilated the Turkish 7th Army which became known as the "nine miles of dead". This was the campaign where Ross and Keith Smith fought in, providing the training ground for their flight from England to Australia in 1919.

These two small photographs from the same camera were taken of the Australian BE2e which was the main aircraft of the Australian Flying Corp in 1916 and 1917.

Two photographs of an Australian BE2e which had a minor crash in the desert. The second photograph shows the number of soldiers sent to help the stricken aircraft.

Late in the war, the Allied aircraft began to dominate the skies and most of the German airforce which were assisting the Turks was destroyed. The capture of German aircraft was rare, with this photo showing a German DFW plane being towed.

Air Mechanics Pay Book

A rare pay book for 1st Class Air Mechanic David Harper who enlisted on the 14th of September 1915 at Point Cook. After training he embarked with the No. 1 Squadron of the Australian Flying Corps on the 16th of March 1916.

This pay book reflects Harper's service from his embarkation on the A67 "Orsova" to the preparations for the Light Horse Campaign in Egypt. From August 1916, each entry is endorsed "In the Field", which signifies the squadrons movement from airfield to airfield as the offensive progressed. The pay book ends with the hospitalisation of Harper in April 1917. He rejoined the No. 1 Squadron and was awarded the Meritorious Service Medal in 1919.

It is estimated only 400 Air Mechanics served in this theatre of the war of which very few pay books survive
